By setting the overall quota for each country in a family to zero, a quota-free allocation system would result in a distorted distribution of scholarships that would produce a sub-optimal distribution of talent in every country. For this reason, the best approach is to set the overall quota to zero and to distribute EAP scholarships according to the existing quota system. Furthermore, there is a need for negotiating additional over-allocation for developing countries. EAP quotas should not be abolished or reformed. On the one hand, they are a solid basis for the allocation of EAPs; on the other hand, they should not be forced on the states since it would undermine the integrity of the EAP quota system. While developing countries need to increase their EAP allocation, this does not mean a cut in the existing quotas or abolishing them. Instead, the main idea should be to extend the same allocation system to more developing countries. A quota-free allocation system can be achieved only if more countries are added to the system. In a quota-free EAP system, all states have an equal opportunity to allocate EAPs, no matter the size of the family or of the state. Considering this system, the distribution of talent would look different than it does in the current system. However, at the same time, eliminating the quota system would induce the states not to allow the family transfer system (or TANF), a powerful tool to transfer talent from less developed countries to more developed ones. Moreover, the states would stop using the EAP system as a way to redistribute their own resources. As a result, the development of talent in many states would face challenges. Therefore, under a quota-free system, it is necessary to modify the existing quota system. Each state would still have its own EAP quota that varies from country to country. The quota could be either fixed or "flexible," with the maximum threshold between zero and 1.25 EAPs for each family per state. In this case, the quota would apply only to the states that wish to receive an EAP allocation. The states that do not participate in the quota
