Q: Backface visibility and CSS on borders I can't manage to make the the edges of a div 'punch out' the center of an image when using `:backface-visibility:hidden` on a div with `background:image(...)`. To me it should be doable using only CSS, as the background of the div with the background is transparent, so it should not even show that the div is there. This seems to be a bug in Chrome 21, but it's hard to tell, because Firefox and IE don't have such a bug, but the borders are still visible. Here's a link to the site: A: To do what you want you need to specify a z-index to your divs. Something like the following should work. `.div1:after { position: absolute; background: #fff; content: "; display: block; top: -1000em; left: 0; width: 100%; height: 100%; z-index: -100000; }` Mohun Bagan have signed their goalkeeper Prasun Bhattacharya for the upcoming I-League season. The 29-year-old is a former East Bengal star who had earlier had spells with Mohun Bagan and Mohammedan Sporting. The Deccan Chronicle report Bhattacharya will be a backup keeper and had a trial with the Bagan A team last week. Prasun had a great season with East Bengal and Mohammedan Sporting last year, where he was the highest-paid player in the second division for the season. He also the Bagan A team to the semi-final of the Syed Mushtaq Ali Trophy. The former India international has 68 caps and was part of the national team side in the 2009 SAFF Cup. Bhattacharya is expected to be a replacement for former national team star Izrail Fenioso. Kalki – Woman of the village Kalki, also known as the village goddess is a well respected and venerated goddess in parts of Uttar Pradesh, India. Her worship is performed by the various Hindu castes and tribes of Northern India. The primary practice of the devotees is to construct a small temple and perform rituals in her honor

A typical conventional gas treatment system for removing harmful gases such as carbon monoxide (CO) and NO_x from an exhaust gas contains an air injection device having an injector nozzle, a first partition wall surrounding the injector nozzle and defining the upstream and downstream gas flow passages therein, and an air supply conduit for supplying air to the upstream gas flow passage defined by the first partition wall. An air filter is disposed in the air supply conduit and configured to remove solid impurities in the air passing through the air supply conduit. Upon combustion of gaseous fuel in a burner, an exhaust gas is generated, which flows from the burner and passes through the first partition wall, through the injector nozzle and into the second partition wall. The oxygen in the air supplied to the upstream gas flow passage is injected around the upstream side of the injector nozzle through the injector nozzle and imparts swirling flow to the exhaust gas passing through the first partition wall. Thus, the exhaust gas passing through the injector nozzle is cleaned, and the air flowing through the injector nozzle is mixed with the exhaust gas cleaning the same of combustion products. The cleaned exhaust gas is then discharged through the second partition wall. The air filter contained in the air supply conduit is preferably configured as an annular filter having a central hole (e.g., circular hole) formed therein. The first partition wall has a number of slots formed therein so that the air flowing through the injector nozzle is divided into a plurality of passages. Thus, the air supplied through the air supply conduit is divided into a plurality of axial flows which impinge upon the outer surface of the annular filter through the holes formed therein, thereby cleaning the air supplied to the injector nozzle. However, in the air filter, as the shape of the central hole (e.g., circular hole) in the annular filter is sharp, the particle size of the solid impurities contained in the air passing through the annular filter is large. Therefore, the area of the central hole (e.g., circular hole) in the annular filter is limited. As a result, it is difficult to ensure a desired filter capacity, and the cleaning ability of the air supplied through the injector nozzle is reduced.
